Text Chat Question

Why should we consider a linked approach?

Prevention
Institute
Prevention and equity at the center of community well-being

Why should we consider a linked approach?

Honoring the linkages between multiple forms of violence reduces potential shortcomings associated with addressing different forms of violence independently, including:

- underestimating true scope of victimization;
- limitations in identifying children who are poly-victims;
- unnecessary competition for scarce resources;
- reduced policy influence;
- reinforcing arbitrary distinctions and
- ignoring the perspective of the child and community.

“I’m a better child welfare worker because I can recognize that the parents and the grandparents were victims of violence. We have to do a better job working with our families because I am tired of the cross over youth. Our DCFS children are crossing over to probation because we did not communicate with the right people in the room when they were victims. And that’s why I’m so committed [to an integrated approach].”

“We could get better by working together instead of working in silos because can you imagine me in the middle of the night trying to be a marriage counselor? Can you imagine that? And we’re put in that situation all the time. For me to be able to pick up the phone reach out to someone and say, “Okay this is the situation. What can I say? Where can I send them for information on healthy relationships?” And then we need to have a warm hand off. That would be real progress.”

— Community Violence Outreach Worker

Nexus Committee

Los Angeles, CA

“The biggest potential for growth is cross training. Period. When we have our [domestic violence certification] trainings invite the gang outreach workers and vice versa. Two hours of domestic violence, that’s not enough - or gender sensitivity issues, that’s not enough. The lack of knowledge is why those who are supposed to be your partners in the work have a lack of empathy and compassion. They just don’t get it. Cross training needs to happen in order to move forward.”
